directly following the internationally acclaimed art discontent thomas mcevilley argues in art otherness for an advanced anthropological perspective that contravenes conventional thinking in the visual arts and leads to a concept of artistic globalization the description of western culture as superior and in opposition to other cultures of the world preoccupied our aesthetic philosophy for at least 200 years whether or not explicitly stated that argument was undertaken in various guises especially as the historical determinism of hegel which proposed to quantify human progress recently however the term multiculturalism has come to signify a post modern understanding of how visual arts transgress artificial boundaries and of how there may now exist perhaps for the first time in history a post colonial globalism in the arts freed of ethnocentric value judgements in these ten crucial essays mcevilley clarifies how the presentation of art can determine its reception how influence can be bi directional how otherness serves to define self and how art need not necessarily lose its
